Border Commuter Rule and regulation

- A F-3 Visa, also known as a “commuter visa” is utilized by a foreign national that commutes into the United States for school. Individuals who can access this type of visa must reside within 75 miles of the academic institution at which they are studying. In other words, this type of visa is available only to a student who lives in Mexico or Canada attending classes in the United States within a proximity to the border.
- Unlike an F-1 Visa, a student with an F-3 Visa is prohibited from residing in the United States.
- To obtain and maintain an F-3 Visa, a person must be enrolled in school either full or part time. The requirements for part time enrollment under federal law are quite liberal when it comes to an F-3 Visa. To meet the threshold requirement to obtain an F-3 Visa, a student need only be enrolled in one class.
- As an aside, an individual with an F-3 Visa is not legally able to obtain any type of employment in the United States, whether on or off campus. The purpose of this visa is very limited: to permit an individual the ability to commute to and from a U.S. school, attend classes, participate in other related educational programming and then return home to Mexico or Canada.
- Other limitations associated with an F-3 Visa include a student being prohibited from owning a motor vehicle with U.S. license plates. Of course, as has been noted, a student cannot reside in the United States.

Renewal Requirements for F-3 Visas: An F-3 Visa is renewed on a semester-by-semester basis if the student is maintaining the status.
